Electric Airplanes in the Future

If you're an airplane manufacturer still turning out products first conceived of in the 1940s or 1950s — and you don't have anything revolutionary in the planning stages — the time to panic is now. The articles indicate it is likely that the next wave of innovation will come from Europe at the hands of Airbus Group, which has formed a subsidiary called -VoltAir SAS in France to build a family of plug-in and hybrid-electric light airplanes. Preliminary data looks promising. The idea is to be able to offer an airplane with similar performance to that of today's gasoline piston offerings but which would burn 25 to 50 percent less fuel. Purchase price is targeted to be close to those of current GA piston airplanes like the Cessna 172 (so somewhere in the range of $400,000) with smaller fuel bills theoretically tilting the economics in favor of the hybrid-electric approach.
